Learning and Inference with Expectations

Probabilistic models can be characterized using expectations of functions of random variables. This can in turn be used to devise methods for learning representations, performing probabilistic inference, and discriminative learning. The talk will survey such methods, highlighting both theoretical results and their practical implications.